challenged by t photographer who had celebrated the ins ience. During the 1920s, Henri Cartier-Bresson st covered Eugène Atget's work. He captures fleeting mome ape, travelling around the world and adopting innovative angles and gra Magnum Photos alongside Robert Capa, David Seymour, Willima de Vandivert vers the Cold War, Ghandi's funeral, the Communist revolution in China or the U s through the depiction of ordinary sceneries and people: History told by various st ed and uncertain about photojournalism's new identity - now challenged by televi tography in the 1970s and returns to drawing. The French photographer who had celeb g society, finally returned to a slow and meditative experience. During the 1920s, Henri Ca to Photography in the early 1930s after having discovered Eugène Atget's work. He captur his camera under a sheet or behind scotch tape, travelling around the world and adopting in practice. After World War II, he founds Magnum Photos alongside Robert Capa, David Seymou tojournalism. Yet, even when he covers the Cold W Ghandi's funeral, the Communist revoluti ues to describe these global events through the depiction of ordinary sceneries and people: Histo ith the eyes th understand.' Tired and uncertain about photojournali 's new identity - now c sson decides to abandon photography in the 1970s and returns to drawing. The French photograph hotography and the changing society, finally returned to a slow and meditative experience. The 1 on studies academic drawing and painting before turning to photography in the early 1930s after hav g moments and street scenes from everyday life, hiding his camera under a sheet or behind scotch tap angles and graphic compositions inspired by his artistic practice. After World War II, he founds Magn a de Vandivert and George Rodger and specializes in photojournalism. Yet, even when he covers the Cold War, Ghandi's fu unist revo China or the United States postwar expansion, he continues to describe these global events through the depiction of ordinary sceneries and people: y told by various stories - 'I observe, observe, observe, it is with the eyes that I understand.' Tired and uncertain about photojournalism's new identity - hallenged by television's sensationalism, Henri Cartier-Bresson decides to abandon photography in the 1970s and returns to drawing. The French phoer who had celebrated the instantaneous pace of street photography and the changing society, finally returned to a slow and meditative experience. he 1920s, Henri Cartier-Bresson studies academic drawing and painting before turning to photography in the early 1930s after having discovered et's work. He captures fleeting moments and street scenes from everyday life, hiding his camera under a sheet or behind scotch tape, travelling world and adopting innovative angles and graphic compositions inspired by his artistic practice. After World War II, he founds Magnum Photos bert Capa, David Seymour, Willima de Vandivert and George Rodger and specializes in photojournalism. Yet, even when he covers the Cold War, al, the Communist revolution in China or the United States postwar expansion, he continues to describe these global events through the depiction of sceneries and people: History told by various stories - 'I observe, observe, observe, it is with the eyes that I understand.' Tired and uncertain about photojournalism's alism's new identity - now challenged by television's sensationalism, Henri Cartier-Bresson decides to abandon photography in the 1970s and returns to drawing.
g. The French photographer who had celebrated the instantaneous pace of street photography and the changing society, finally returned to a slow and meditative ve experience. During the 1920s, Henri Cartier-Bresson studies academic drawing and painting before turning to photography in the early 1930s after having discovered Eugène Atget's work. He captures fleeting moments and street scenes from everyday life, hiding his camera under a sheet or behind scotch tape, elling around the world and adopting innovative angles and graphic compositions inspired by his artistic practice. After World War II, he founds Magnum Photos alongside Robert Capa, David Seymour, Willima de Vandivert and George Rodger and specializes in photojournalism. Yet, even when he covers the Cold War, Ghandi's funeral, the Communist revolution in China or the United States postwar expansion, he continues to describe these global events through the depiction n of ordinary sceneries and people: History told by various stories - 'I observe, observe, observe, it is with the eyes that I understand.' Tired and uncertain about photojournalism's new identity - now challenged by television's sensationalism, Henri Cartier-Bresson decides to abandon photography in the 1970s and urns to drawing. The French photographer who had celebrated the instantaneous pace of street photography and the changing society, finally returned to a slow w and meditative experience. The Decisive Moment. During the 1920s, Henri Cartier-Bresson studies academic drawing and painting before turning to photography raphy in the early 1930s after having discovered Eugène Atget's work. He captures fleeting moments and street scenes from everyday life, hiding his camera n under a sheet or behind scotch tape, travelling around the world and adopting innovative angles and graphic compositions inspired by his artistic practice. tice. After World War II, he founds Magnum Photos alongside Robert Capa, David Seymour, Willima de Vandivert and George Rodger and specializes in photo-urnalism. Yet, even when he covers the Cold War, Ghandi's funeral, the Communist revolution in China or the United States postwar expansion, he continues cribe these global events through the depiction of ordinary sceneries and people: History told by various stories - 'I observe, observe, observe, it is with the eyes that I understand.' Tired and uncertain about photojournalism's new identity - now challenged by television's sensationalism, Henri Cartier-Bresson decides to abandon photography in the 1970s and returns to drawing. The French photographer who had celebrated the instantaneous pace of street photography and the changing society, finally returned to a slow and meditative experience. During the 1920s, Henri Cartier-Bresson studies academic drawing and painting before turning to photography in the early 1930s after having discovered Eugène Atget's work. He captures fleeting moments and street scenes from everyday life, hiding his camera under a sheet or behind scotch tape, travelling around the world and adopting innovative angles and graphic compositions inspired by his artistic practice. After World War II, he founds Magnum Photos alongside Robert Capa, David Seymour, Willima de Vandivert and George Rodger and specializes in photojournalism. Yet, even when he covers the Cold War, Ghandi's funeral, the Communist revolution in China or the United States postwar expansion, he continues to describe these global events through the depiction of ordinary sceneries and people: History told by various stories - 'I observe, observe, observe, it is with the eyes that I understand.' Tired and uncertain about photojournalism's new identity - now challenged by television's sensationalism, Henri Cartier-Bresson decides to abandon photography in the 1970s and returns to drawing. The French photographer who had celebrated the instantaneous pace of street photography and the changing society, finally returned to a slow and meditative experience. During the 1920s, Henri Cartier-Bresson studies academic drawing and painting before turning to photography in the early 1930s after having discovered Eugène Atget's work. He captures fleeting moments and street scenes from everyday life, hiding his camera under a sheet or behind scotch tape, travelling around the world and adopting innovative angles and graphic